EDITORIAL NOTE

The register of the Limerick House of Industry for the period 1774 to 1793, formerly in the Limerick family papers at Chiddingly in Sussex, is now part of Limerick City Archives where it has been given the serial number P18/1. The register consists of 198 pages of which 191 contain text. The register is bound in reverse calf and is inscribed on the front 'Work House, Limerick; General Registry. 1774'. A title page carries the text 'General Registry of the Poor Received into the House of INDUSTRY from the Institution thereof 1774.' Each page is ruled vertically and horizontally, the details on each person admitted usually taking up a single line, initially divided into twenty columns, as follows: (1) 'current number'; (2) 'names'; (3) 'age'; (4) 'religion' — 'roman catholic'; (5) 'religion' — 'protestant'; (6) 'occupation'; (7) 'late residence'; (8) date of admission; (9) if 'voluntary' admission; (10) if 'compulsory' admission; (11) 'number of bed'; (12) if 'healthy' when received; (13) if 'sickly' when received; (14) 'disease when received'; (15) date on which 'discharged'; (16) date on which 'died'; (17) date on which 'eloped'; (18) if 'healthy' when discharged; (19) if 'sickly' when discharged; (20) 'observations'. Shortly after the commencement of the register the recording of information on 'number of bed' was discontinued. Occasionally the column headings for religion (4, 5) and medical condition on entry (12, 13) were reversed. The transcript standardises column headings throughout. The register finishes in 1793 when there is no further space for additional entries. The location of later registers, if they existed, is unknown.¹

The aim here has been to provide a faithful transcription of the register. Consequently the temptation to expand a date from its simplest and most common form — the day in the month — to the full form of 'day, month, year' by reference to adjacent dates, has been resisted, except where the 'Admitted' column breaks onto a new page; here the date is repeated for ease of reference. Similarly the spelling of personal names, place names, occupations and ailments are given as in the register. No attempt was made to expand an abbreviated word or to replace the frequently used abbreviations 'd', 'do', or 'ditto' with the word to which they referred. The inconsistent and irregular use of colons, dashes and dots to indicate an abbreviation has been removed except where the meaning might be unclear. On rare occasions the clerk repeats a word or numeral unnecessarily; such instances are noted in the transcription by the use of sic. Finally, superscripted letters have not been reproduced here and are rendered as normal text.

¹ The one-time existence of other books belonging to the House is highlighted in two observations (459 and 463) in the register where a 'Remark Book' is mentioned.

INTRODUCTION

THE POOR LAW IN EARLY MODERN IRELAND

From the late medieval period European states increasingly grappled with perceived problems associated with poverty. Distinctions were made between the old and impotent poor who deserved relief and those who were able-bodied but unemployed and deserving of punishment rather than help, if found begging or troublesome. English initiatives provided an example from which the Irish drew. From 1542, Irish legislation copied from a 1532 English law, provided for the registration of the impotent poor and allowed them to beg within their parish and punished those who wandered from it. The able-bodied were to be confined to the stocks.² Yet the most significant English legislative measure, adopted in the sixteenth century and recast in 1598 and 1601, which provided for a national system of parochial relief, was never adopted in Ireland, partly because of fears that it would lead to increased taxation.³ For the most part, relief for the poor in Ireland was ad hoc and left to private initiatives and to parishes.⁴

Vagrancy received far more attention. In 1576 and again in 1610 the English parliament agreed to establish 'houses of correction' for the able-bodied poor who refused to work and for other miscreants.⁵ In 1635 the Irish parliament adopted a similar measure, stipulating that houses of correction should be built in every county.⁶ Only a handful of places including Downpatrick, Kilkenny, Limerick and Mullingar, implemented the legislation.⁷ In the eighteenth century there was renewed interest in poverty and its consequences, while a regular-sitting Irish parliament provided greater opportunities for tackling it.⁸ In 1703 and 1735, parliament established workhouses in Dublin and Cork respectively in response to local initiatives.⁹ Individuals planned and sometimes established institutions for poor relief. In 1749, Dean Charles Massy advocated the building of a Limerick workhouse, but nothing was done. Ten years later, the idea was adopted by the new bishop of the diocese, James Leslie, who subscribed fifty guineas to establish a workhouse, but his enthusiasm was not matched by others and the scheme failed.¹⁰ A poorhouse operated by the Belfast Charitable Society was instituted in 1771.

A NEW POOR LAW, 1772

A proposal for a national system of county workhouses funded by subscription and local taxation was first proposed in 1729 by Arthur Dobbs.¹¹ In the decades that followed a number of similar schemes, based on the English and Dutch poor laws, were promoted, but with little affect.¹² It was not until 1766 that any serious attention was given to the subject again. In that year Richard Woodward, dean of Clogher, proposed a network of county poorhouses, supported through taxation and donations, to maintain the aged and infirm and ensure that vagrants were put to work.¹³

The 1771–2 parliamentary session initiated two uncoordinated measures to reform the existing arrangements of poor relief. The first regulated the Dublin workhouse and foundling hospital.¹⁴ The second, more substantial measure repealed the earlier Tudor and Stuart laws, and permitted a system of licensed begging for the ‘helpless poor’ who had been resident within a specific city, town, barony or parish for at least one year. Those licensed were to display badges giving their name, place of birth, character, and cause of poverty. Licensed beggars were permitted to have one child with them; any other child would be sent to the nearest charity school or be apprenticed. Unlicensed beggars would be placed in the stocks for a specified number of hours. Significantly, the act provided for the establishment of houses of industry, divided into four departments to cater for poor helpless men, poor helpless women, ‘vagabonds and sturdy beggars’, and ‘idle, strolling and disorderly women’. Where houses were established all unlicensed beggars should be admitted and set to work.¹⁵

Each county and the counties of cities and towns were to establish a poor-law corporation to grant licenses to beggars and build, maintain and regulate houses of industry. These corporations were to be presided over by the archbishop or bishop in whose diocese the corporation operated, and were to have the county’s members of parliament, justices of the peace, mayor and sheriffs as ex-officio members, together with all those who subscribed a single payment of £20 or £3 annually for its support. Bishops were permitted to provide land from their sees for houses, while the grand juries were to raise not less than £100 and not more than £4,000 annually to support them. Moreover, the legislation provided for an annual church collection and charity sermons.¹⁶ In the years that followed, further legislation refined the requirements, but the system broadly remained until reforms in the 1830s established a ‘new’ poor law.¹⁷

The 1772 legislation was largely unsuccessful. Besides the earlier foundations at Dublin,¹⁸ Cork, Belfast, Lisburn and Coleraine, on which the system was largely based, only seven new houses were built: in Limerick (1774), Ennis (1775), Maryborough (1775), Waterford (1779), Clonmel (1811), Kilkenny (1814), and Wexford (1816). As there was no compulsion on grand juries to fund a house of industry and as the scheme would have increased local taxes, most opted not to establish one.

THE LIMERICK HOUSE OF INDUSTRY, 1774–1841

Limerick city was the first to establish a poor-law corporation and build a house of industry. Bishop William Gore provided a site on the North Strand across the river Shannon from the city. In 1773 the county and city grand juries granted £500 towards the cost of building the House, the first stone of which was laid on 10 March 1774 and completed sometime in late 1774 or early 1775.¹⁹ As stipulated by the act, it was managed by a corporation of ex-officio officers and magistrates, as well as perpetual and annual subscribers. By April 1774 there were twenty annual subscribers and four life governors, of whom Bishop Gore subscribed the largest amount of £500.²⁰ He along with the Rev. Deane Hoare and Captain Lancelot Hill were its main promoters. Designed by Hoare, it had sixteen rooms and a separate building (completed in 1777) at the foot of its garden with cells for lunatics and an infirmary.²¹ The House joined the city's other institutions for the relief of the poor, namely Hall's almshouses, the corporation's almshouses, Craven's almshouses, the Blue School, and a county infirmary.²²

Between April and September 1774, while the House was under construction, the governors began to implement the 1772 legislation by badging the poor, removing vagrants from the streets and by accommodating the helpless poor in a disused military infirmary in the city's Irishtown.²³ On 19 September the first eight paupers were admitted to the temporary House.²⁴ By October the newspapers reported that the city's streets were entirely cleared of beggars.²⁵ If such was the case, the numbers were small. The register records twenty admissions between 19 September and 27 October; all, except two, had been compelled. While the governors were eager to implement this aspect of the legislation, they chose to ignore other parts of it. For example, although the law stipulated that the able-bodied poor should be subject to a work regime within the house, there is little to indicate that one existed in the early years, though some inmates were occasionally assigned duties in kitchen and garden. It was only in 1799 that the governors sought to employ a person to oversee unspecified work then underway in the House.²⁶

A corporation was also established for county Limerick, but the anticipated costs and the success of the city's venture prompted an amalgamation in 1775–6.²⁷ In neighbouring Clare, a corporation had been formed in September 1775, and had built its house in Ennis by 1779.²⁸ Nevertheless, between 1774 and 1793 the Limerick House admitted 258 individuals from Clare, amounting to 9.4 percent of all admissions.

While Church of Ireland clergymen were at the forefront in having the Limerick House established, Roman Catholic clergy were also consulted on how best to relieve the poor. In 1783, catholic priests met the governors on at least two occasions to arrange for distribution of food rations and, in what must have been an attempt to prevent the spread of disease, to discuss the best means of 'bathing' the poor of the city.²⁹ In 1792 the governors asked both the Church of Ireland and Roman Catholic bishops and their clergy to
