	INDEX	139

INTRODUCTION

In the midst of his conflict with Oliver Plunkett over the primacy of Ireland, the exasperated archbishop of Dublin, Peter Talbot, declared: ‘The Armagh registers abound in manifest falsehoods and therefore no proof in support of that Primacy can be drawn from them.’¹ Just under three centuries later, whilst reviewing Aubrey Gwynn’s Medieval Province of Armagh, G. O. Sayles struck a more positive note, remarking that the registers ‘constitute the largest and most important single source of original material, still surviving in Ireland, for its medieval past.’²

The registers to which both writers referred now exist in seven volumes deposited in the Public Record Office of Northern Ireland named after each of the primates with whose episcopal reigns they are mainly concerned: Sweetman, Fleming, Swayne, Prene, Mey, Octavian and Cromer. The registers owe their present form to Archbishop James Ussher who, sometime between 1609 and 1630, sorted and bound what came to him in the form of twelve ‘books’ into the seven extant volumes. Alone of all the registers, the one known as Cromer does not have a seventeenth century index of contents attached. Ussher constructed his ‘Cromer’ volume from two ‘books’ of papers which he acquired separately.³ The first is the consistory and metropolitan court act book (hereafter referred to as the Act Book) which almost entirely predates Cromer’s episcopal reign as it covers the years 1518 to 1521. The second is the ‘register’ proper, which mainly deals with the period 1522 to 1534.⁴

The Act Book is written on paper with a lone parchment page bound in at the start. Comparison with Bishop William Reeves’ (1815–1892) nineteenth-century transcription of the text suggests that there has been some very slight deterioration of the volume since then which is mainly confined to the first three folios.⁵ The first two folios along with folios 12 and 13 have become detached from their binding. The volume as a whole has suffered at some point in the past from damp which has now been arrested. This makes reading those parts more difficult. Greasy patches and smears punctuate the manuscript also, again rendering areas, such as folio 20r and 20v, illegible in the original. Parts of the manuscript show fading with the result that some parts — such as folios 23, 28–31 — would be almost completely impenetrable if it were not for the existence of the Bishop Reeves transcript.

THIS EDITION

In order to make the Act Book manageable for readers and researchers any edition needs to break the manuscript down into units which correspond as closely as possible to particular cases. Reeves began the task by piecing together suits which were spread over several folios. L. P. Murray further developed the idea by dividing the Act Book into 152 entries which made it possible for a researcher to cite cases and so handle the long text.⁶

When I came to work on the Act Book I decided that it would be useful to embark on a further refinement of Murray's scheme. For instance, his entry no. 22 covers the two records found on f. 8v: the start of a defamation suit and a case concerning illegal sequestration of goods. Murray made these no. 22 and 22A but here they are nos 24 and 25. This has been done with a view, where possible, to restoring a sense of the individual pieces of litigation. Murray also operated on the basis that if a decision in a suit occurred on the next folio to the rest of the acta it merited a separate number. So, the marriage suit McKy v. Nywegorman is entry 17 and 118 in the Louth Archaeological Society Journal edition whereas in this volume is simply no. 116. Murray's practise of separate numbering for sentences has only been preserved here when there is an appreciable manuscript gap between it and the proceedings.⁷ In the arrangement used here the majority of entries are discrete units. In some instances, such as entry no. 19, the aim has been to illustrate a particular point. Entry no. 19 gives the reader an impression of the variety of a single day's business. Entries no. 44 and no. 45 are actually the same case but have been left distinct because they give rare evidence of a preliminary draft followed by a more detailed account. Other such decisions — and there are only a few — should be easy to understood. This is not an exact science but it does make the text navigable. This edition has 145 entries. Hopefully these editorial choices will prove satisfactory to those who make use of the Act Book.

THE ACT BOOK

So what is the Act Book of an ecclesiastical court? Strictly speaking, it should contain the bare acta (acts) of the court: who presided, where the court sat, when it sat, who the plaintiff and defendant were, the type of the case and the deeds of each hearing. This was in part fulfilment of the stipulations of the Fourth Lateran Council.⁸ An ecclesiastical court usually heard a single stage of each case at each sitting. The scribe would then begin the account of the suit or action with perhaps five or six lines and then add to it, piecemeal, over the ensuing weeks or months. This lends many of the entries a terseness that makes for somewhat jerky reading. The compilers of this text have generally kept the various parts of each litigation on the same or consecutive folios. A single hand is dominant throughout the Act Book. This can be identified as that of Willielmus Lukin, notary and scribe.⁹ Five other hands are apparent but as each makes only one or two appearances which suggests that Lukin had no deputy or regular replacement. This helps explain why the Act Book has such good internal coherence. Other references point to an accompanying deposition book. Three entries (all early in the text as it is now) suggest the scribe is pointing any future reader towards a deposition ‘roll’. Entries 7 and 8 both speak of it being ‘in the third quarter of this volume’ while entry no. 26 says it is ‘at the end of the book’. The text has many other lacunae and omissions. This should not be assumed to be the result of missing pages since the vast majority of cases which were initiated in the courts Christian never reached formal final judgement because of the strong emphasis on out of court settlement or reconciliation. The extant sentences give no grounds for the judge’s decision. Accordingly, the use and application of canon law has to be deduced from what information is present. Some of the penances here are detailed but most are not. It is also clear that there were instances in which the judge retained the record of the sentence in his own possession.

THE ECCLESIASTICAL COURT AND THE ARMAGH DIOCESE

For today’s reader the striking aspect of this court is, perhaps, its wide cognizance. It dealt with very many matters which have since become the business of civil jurisdiction.¹⁰ In the early sixteenth century the church courts were not marginal entities but central to an array of legal facts of life. Ecclesiastical courts had sole jurisdiction over marriage cases, defamation, legitimacy of persons, wills and testaments as well as all matters pertaining to the clergy and the church’s extensive properties. The church regulated sexual, moral and religious discipline of all of the baptized.

Just as with the secular courts the structures of the ecclesiastical courts were the product of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. Their jurisdiction was coterminous with that of the diocese. This had significant ramifications in the Armagh diocese since the divisions which affected all of late medieval Ireland were reflected in the ecclesiastical administrative system. Armagh was divided into two parts. The area Inter Anglicos (amongst the English) consisted of the three deaneries of Drogheda, Ardee and Dundalk corresponding roughly to the area of modern Co. Louth. Inter Hibernicos (amongst the Irish) was composed of the deaneries of Tullaghoge (centred on the traditional inauguration site of the O’Neills in Co. Tyrone), Erthir (O’Hanlon territory of Co. Armagh) and Armagh itself.

⁹ See entries 9 and 67, where he names himself.

The archbishop's court confined its attentions chiefly to the part of the diocese Inter Anglicos and so most of the cases presented here come from modern Co. Louth. This does not mean that the archbishop's writ did not run in other parts of his diocese. For example in May 1518, the dean of Armagh denounced Dominus Iohannes Oculean, the rector of Clonfegne (in south Co. Tyrone) to the court for slander.¹¹ Furthermore, two appeals come from the suffragan sees of Derry and Down (both Inter Hibernicos).

The two archbishops of Armagh whose reigns coincide with the Act Book are remote figures as far as these records are concerned. John Kite had been provided to the diocese in October of 1513 and was generally absent, leaving Ireland for the last time in 1516.¹² He disliked Armagh and Ireland, which made him bemoan his severance from 'the wealth of all the joys of England'.¹³ Kite resigned his see in July 1521, to become titular archbishop of Thebes and bishop of Carlisle. The first mention of the vacancy comes in a sentence given on 13 February 1521 and it persists until up to 3 April 1522.¹⁴ In the meantime, George Cromer had been provided to the diocese on 2 October 1521. Cromer's appointment and subsequent arrival in the country appears to have heralded the end for this Act Book.¹⁵ The ecclesiastical courts functioned well in the absence of the archbishop which shows that in Armagh, as in most other dioceses of Christendom, the involvement of bishops in secular affairs and royal services did not necessarily have a detrimental effect on the judicial system.

THE JUDGES

In any court litigants are fleeting figures often leaving in the record the sole surviving trace of their existence. This Act Book contains a wealth of previously unnoticed names. Administration and interpretation of the extensive ecclesiastical law demanded that a body of competent officers existed. These men have left more substantial clues to their activities and their backgrounds.

The name of the presiding judge heads many of the entries along with the date and sitting location. The judge set the date for hearings, made interim orders and, most crucially for the parties of course, decided on the merits of the case at the close.

Five named judges dominate this Act Book. They are Alexander Plunkett, Iacobus White, Ricardus Springan, Thomas Noter and Cormac Roth. Three others appear on a single occasion each as presiding judge: Alexander Delpalatio,¹⁶ Michaelis Golding,¹⁷ and Walterus Cusake.¹⁸ It is with the first five that we are most concerned.

It was not an absolute requirement for those who served as judges to hold degrees

1. Payment of a stipend

This folio is badly damaged and the Reeves transcript contains more than is currently legible. The case appears to have been concerned with the payment of a stipend, possibly to a curate, in the parish of Tullyallen.
